In this book, Guillaume Faye, the firebrand of the French New Right, confronts the phenomenon of mass immigration head-on. Rather than talking about 'immigration', Faye insists that we must speak of a massive colonisation settlement of the West by peoples from the Global South. This, together with declining birthrates, means that Europeans will soon become a minority in Europe, and their ancient and unique heritage will disappear. He furthermore demonstrates that the Islamic world is carrying out a hostile takeover both of France and Europe, with 'youth delinquency' and terrorism being the first indicators of a coming ethnic civil war as Europe is overwhelmed through its porous borders. All of these facts are taboo for Europe's leaders and 'intellectuals', who are working to organise Europe's demise. This is a more serious threat than all the plagues and wars ever experienced by Europe. Likewise, Faye directs criticism at some of his former colleagues in the New Right for failing to grasp the reality of the situation. He calls to prepare for the only meaningful answer to this crisis: the Reconquista.

A dreamer

By Jackal

Colonisation refers to Muslims from the Middle East moving to Europe. He loosely compares Islamic colonisation in the 21st century to European colonisation in the 19th century. He doesn't like either, but thinks the new wave of colonisation is worse because it represents a more primitive culture as well as a high population growth.

The book is far too long and meandering for its own good. Unfortunately, more than 90% of the book is spent making the case of colonisation and there is very little discussion about possible solutions. I would have liked a bit more data about the colonisation. One gets the impression that the demographic shift is just around the corner. That was clearly not the case in 2000, and is not the case in 2016. Some demographic statistics would make the author's case stronger.

The book contains a short discussion of solutions. He discards the US melting pot solution as not suitable for France due to higher population density. He does not believe it is possible to assimilate immigrants because the political will is absent. I wish the author would have spent much more time thinking about solutions. He criticises Benoist for having suggested something like a bi-cultural France existing side by side (i.e. traditional French and Muslim French). Benoist proposal is a pragmatic solution to an existing problem. Faye's solution is very idealistic; repatriation following a massive economic and social crisis. I find this very crude and naive. What if there is no such crisis? Is repatriation any more realistic than assimilation? The author does not seem very interested in elaborating.

Despite being written in 2000, the book is relevant in 2016. It describes France, but the issues have recently become central in a number of European countries. We have to give the author credit for having pointed out a problem that have now reached centre stage in Europe. It is also striking that not much has changed in the mainstream political parties' response to the new challenges.

Looking forward to read a more recent book book by the publisher, I guess, in 2017
