Review

"It was Saturday, and Jo wanted to go out.

'I've saved up all my money,' she said to her mum. 'Can we go shopping? I'd like to buy something.'

'OK, Jo,' said Mum. 'I've got to post this parcel to Granny, anyway.'

It was Granny's birthday next week. Jo had made her a special birthday card."

An all time favourite.

By Mummoo

I grew up in South East London, where Jo and her family, as well as the author, hail from.

This book (along with Through My Window and In A Minute) really capture the London of my childhood (90s).

They are lovely stories which had many years of use when I was young, and now my daughter loves them too. The illustrations are fantastic. Extremely detailed with lots to look at. These have kept my daughter captivated since she was about 13 months old. They are still regularly read now she is two and a half, and I foresee them being a firm favourite for years to come.

I would say the books are aimed at around five years and up. Really good books for children when they are learning to read.

In this story, Jo and her Mum go in to town to post a parcel to her Gran for her birthday. Jo also has some pocket money she wants to spend! They stop off at various shops on the way and Jo is tempted to spend her money. She decides to "wait and see" what to spend her money on at each stop, which is just as well as when they reach the post office her Mum has forgotten her purse. Jo gives her the money to post her Grandma's parcel. On the way home all the shop keepers reward her kind gesture by giving her produce from their shops. Which is also just as well, as the neighbour's dog has eaten the lunch Jo's Dad had lovingly prepared when they were out!

I'd recommend this book to anyone with a little bookworm!

Cute, Multicultural Book

By M. Dobbs

This book is really cute. I'm always looking for books with multicultural characters to add to my daughter's library, and this one is the latest one I found. It's set in England so some of the words they use are different than what we (Americans) use and that's something else that my daughter will find interesting as she gets older (she's 2). The story is very cute and has nothing to do with race (it's a little girl deciding what she wants to do with her money) but I like that so many cultures are represented. I'd recommend this book to everyone.
